

Photo: University of Rochester News Center

NOTICE!

Keep One Tunnel for Student Voices

Rochester already has a tradition of students painting the tunnels, and I think that is something worth keeping. One tunnel should stay mainly for students – a place where people can make art, share ideas, advertise events, or even complain about things they do not like about the university.

Not every part of campus needs to look perfect or official. Honestly, the tunnel being a little messy is part of what makes it feel like a student space instead of another school advertisement.

There would obviously be some costs. The university would have to pay for paint, cleaning, repairs, and staff time. Some messages might also make visitors, parents, or donors uncomfortable. There should still be basic rules. Threats, harassment, and anything unsafe should not be allowed.

But I think that is part of the point. Student expression only matters if students are allowed to say things the university may not always like.

One question to think about:

Do we still support student voices when we disagree with what they are saying?